

Dealing with TANTRUMS

By Simone Davies

I'm going to dive right in to discuss a very tricky area for parents and children alike: tantrums.

I hope you find this article useful so you can start applying Montessori principles in your home too.

Dealing with Tantrums

Tantrums are a pretty normal part of life with children from around one to five years old. Maybe they'll start a little later than one year and will end earlier, but anything in this range is fairly normal. Your child is learning that things don't always go their way. And, as parents, we are helping them learn how to deal with these emotions and to make amends.

It can be upsetting for a parent. It's hard to realize that your child is actually asking for your help. They are overwhelmed by the situation and need your support to calm down. It's not the time to take it personally.

How to Avoid Tantrums

It can be possible to avoid tantrums before your child loses control. Here are some ideas to ward off tantrums when you see the first signs of your child losing control.

1. Be prepared: take a small bag with some simple games and some favorite snacks if you expect your child to wait patiently in a doctor's office or a cafe.
2. Label their feelings: "Boy, you really wish you could stay longer"; "You really wanted some orange juice right now!"
3. Redirect them: "I can't let you hit your brother; but you can hit this drum/pillow."
4. Get down to their level: "You sound frustrated. Can you tell me why?"
5. If they are struggling, ask them if they would like some help: give them just as much help as they need and then step back.
6. Give them a choice: "Would you like to put on your shoes or your scarf first?"
7. Establish routines: "... and after lunch we'll go to the toilet, read a book, and tuck in for a rest."
8. Let them show their anger creatively, "Show me how angry you are. Here is some paper and a pencil. Wow. They are big circles. You are really mad!"

Triggers

Events can often escalate to a full-blown tantrum. Sometimes it's from your child's frustration; other times their anger or rage; sometimes because they want to be in control; their communication may still be limited; or because they are tired, hungry, or overstimulated. They can throw themselves on the floor, push us away, try to hit us/a sibling/other child, or even break something.

It can be useful to note things that cause tantrums in your child: over-scheduling can be common; a new baby; moving to a new house; or certain children may trigger them.

Sometimes the tantrum is even caused by us as we deliver the news that it is time to leave the park, or we serve some food they don't like for dinner, or that we would like them to get dressed to leave the house.

It's OK for your child to have a tantrum. You can acknowledge their displeasure at what is going on. You can help them to do the thing that they don't like. However, when we back down and give in to them, you will find they shout even louder next time.

It's difficult to be the parent and stay strong. But your hard work will pay off in the long term. They will learn that when you say no, you mean no; and when you say yes, you mean it too.

I like the advice from Positive Discipline for Preschoolers (by Nelsen EdD, Jane, Erwin M.A., Cheryl, et al. Jul 9, 2019). "If you say it, mean it; and if you mean it, follow through with kind and firm action."

Action may be, for example, leaving the park with a sad toddler, acknowledging that they really wish they could stay longer.

Alternatives to Time Out:

How to Help Your Child Calm Down

When your child is having a tantrum, some experts advise putting them into time out. I find this difficult as your child is asking for help to calm down, and you are removing your support and punishing them instead.

When we punish our children, they often get angry at us rather than being sorry for what they have done. Or they try to work out a way to get away with it next time without being caught.

Instead, I look for ways that I can support my child to calm down. I'm not saying that their behavior is OK, but when they are in the middle of the tantrum, it is not the time to teach them anything. They cannot hear you. They have lost control. So let's help them calm down.

Some children will respond to a cuddle during a tantrum. You can rub their back, cuddle them, and sing to them as they go through all the range of emotions from anger, to intense frustration, to sadness, and sometimes regret. I once held my son for 40 minutes as he refused to get dressed. And I watched him go through all these emotions. In the end, he announced he was ready to get dressed. He told me he loved me. He wasn't angry with me. He was grateful that I had just been there for him. I know sometimes you have to leave, but in this case, we just changed our plans.

Other children will push you away and don't want to be touched. In this case, I make sure they are safe and cannot hurt themselves or others. I stand nearby and keep offering my help, "I'm here if you need some help to calm down. Or we can have a cuddle when you are ready." After the tantrum, I like to offer a cuddle. "That was tough. And now you have calmed yourself down. Would you like a hug?"

If they are throwing toys at their sibling or trying to hit me, I would remove them so that everyone is safe. "I can't let you hit me. My safety is important to me. Would you like to hit these pillows instead?" If your child is trying to hurt the baby, you can place yourself physically between them to keep the baby safe as you help your older child calm down.

For a child over three years old, you can set up a "calm place," which they can use when they are upset. It may be a tent with some pillows and favorite things. It may be a corner with some trains. You can ask your child if she would like to go to her calm place.

This is different than 'time out,' as the older child is in control; she can come out when she feels calm. If she comes back still in a rage, I would gently tell her that she looks like she still needs to calm down and can come back when she is ready.

Making Amends

Maybe you are thinking that if I support my children while they calm down, I'm saying that their behavior is OK, and I'm encouraging them to get angry. When they are upset, indeed, my objective is to help them calm down.

Once they are calm, I then help them to make amends. If they drew on the walls, I would get them to help me clean up. If they broke their brother's toy, they can help to fix it. I've asked the kids to help scrub their sheets when they used marker pens in bed and made a mess.

In this way, they learn to take responsibility when things go wrong. And when it's over, it's over. The good thing about young children is that they can move quickly from deep anger and sadness back to their happy selves. We need to move on too and not let this upset the whole day by referring back to it or keeping on about it. Once they have made amends, it's OK for everyone to move on. ■

Learn from Simone Davies, an AMI Montessori teacher with 15+ years' experience working with 0-3-year olds, owner of Jacaranda Tree Montessori in Amsterdam since 2008, mother of two teenagers, and author of the book The Montessori Toddler. Visit her blog at themontessorinotebook.com/dealing-with-tantrums/

TANTRUM FAQs

Shouldn't we just ignore their tantrum?

I don't like to ignore children when they are having a tantrum. They may not let me touch them, but I keep offering support and letting them know I am available when they need me. If you were super upset and your partner just left the room for you to get over it, you would likely find them unsupportive. We are showing our kids that, good or bad, we will be there for them.

What do I do if we are out in public when they have a tantrum?

There are basically two options:

First: Go home—if you find it difficult to have people watching you, it's best to just leave. This may mean parking a full shopping cart and following the above ideas once you are home.

Second: Stay and support them—my preferred option is to hang in there and do what you would do even though you are out of the house. If you have more than one child with you, make sure they are safe. And then offer as much help as you can to help your child calm down. People watching will more likely think about what a lovely, patient parent you are, rather than what a horrible noise your child is making.

I find it difficult to stay calm myself. What can I do?

If your child has triggered you, it is indeed difficult to help them calm down.

- If your partner is available, it can be easiest to get them to step in instead.
- You may want to make sure the kids are safe, and go to the bathroom to catch your breath.
- Find a mantra that you can repeat, "I breathe in calm, I breathe out anger."
- Remember not to take it personally. Perhaps visualize putting on a bullet-proof suit that will resist everything (including words) that your child throws at you.

These tips should help you remain calm and give your child the support they need to regain control.